

These rules serve two very real and important purposes: first, they help to prevent monopolies by large communications companies, by discouraging expansion beyond a reasonable line and therefore encouraging competition. Secondly, they help to insure that nonbiased information remains easily available to the public, by keeping multiple sources of information open.